Colebrook Bosson Saunders open showroom in Union Street, London Bridge

On Thursday 24th April Colebrook Bosson Saunders opened the doors to their brand new showroom at 35 Union Street, London Bridge and invited in the industry.

This is the first time CBS have had their own showroom and is the result of a mammoth project to excavate the basement of this stunning listed Georgian townhouse. Along the way Roman remains were uncovered causing Museum of London archaeologists to need to painstakingly sift through the site before works could continue. It was discovered that 35 Union Street was built upon the remains of a Roman Villa; parts of an under-floor central heating system were found in the excavation along with wine vessels from Spain.

Despite these trials and tribulations the showroom has now been completed to the highest specification, incorporating state of the art technology: Advanced audio visual systems with video conferencing now linking the CBS London office to CBS offices around the world. Software controls content across multiple screens; touch screens and 3D plasma screens are also in place enabling thrilling yet seamless presentations. The basement was designed as a multi-functioning environment for anything from large-scale presentations to meeting space or club nights.

On the night of the launch guests were given an extra special experience. A photographic studio was set up where Morley von Sternberg created stunning portraits of guests and CBS staff.

CBS invited sitters to present themselves as they are and who they might want to be. Guests responded with imagination, flair and humour . . .

CBS intend to fully exploit their amazing new space with lots more events to follow . . .
